

Enby Roman is an investigation into the role of typefaces in the evolution of language. It tries to contribute to an emerging issue in the graphic design community through independent research: What is the relationship between gender and typeface? What is the agency of design projects in the deconstruction of binary perception ?

Although feminists and LGBTQ+ revendications are connected to communication design on many more aspects, our discipline can empower cultural progress, the battle against patriarchal models also offers crucial openings to our concerns on the discipline.

Given my cultural background and my situation as a French white cis male, it seemed to be a necessity to contextualise my project in a wider perspective, and refer to the debates, initiatives and actors of such contemporary cultural issues. I took inspiration from the median point and the used it to create ligatures that unify the word and its endings in a better way.

As a designer, I believe that language is constitutive of one's reality, and is shaped by technologies whose impact may be enough to modify and change — in this exact way — our perception of the world.
